Causes of low WBC counts with a differential phenotype similar to chronic myelogenous leukemia. We present two cases with low WBC counts (Leukocyte count less than $2000 \times 10^9/L$) and platelet counts of less than $20 \times 10^9/L$, both of them with a variant phenotype as compared to chronic myelogenous leukemia. The variants shown in the peripheral blood smears in both cases were large, round, mature neutrophils, and lacked the morphologic features of myeloproliferative disorders. The first patient exhibited a significant left shift, and the second patient showed an increased number of myeloblasts. Cytogenetic analysis of the two cases showed no common abnormality. A follow-up of the patients showed their symptoms to be relieved. The polymorphonuclear neutrophils from each patient were treated with daunorubicin to check if the anomalies were caused by this drug. It was shown that the morphology of these cells did not differ from those of normal cells in spite of the fact that the cytofluorometric analysis of the nuclear DNA revealed that the cells contained daunorubicin-derived DNA. The findings in these cases are in favor of the possibility that some of the marrow cells possess a colony-forming ability and, project: Transcription factor homeostasis in endodermal cells is essential for the establishment and maintenance of a functional intestine. The transcription factors GATA4 and GATA6 are essential for endodermal cell proliferation and differentiation in both the gut and the lung. The transcriptional activities of these proteins are inhibited in epithelial cells undergoing intestinal differentiation, but not during lung differentiation. I hypothesize that GATA4 and GATA6 function as molecular switches to regulate the fate of endodermal cells in the gut and the lung. I propose to: 1) determine how GATA
